Who caused your loved one's nursing home bruise?

When you visit your loved one in a nursing home and spot a bruise, your mind may start racing: was the wound caused by a simple accident, or perhaps by something more sinister? While the elderly may bruise more easily than others, unexplained bruises should be a reason for concern, especially if they appear often or in certain areas.

Find out what percentage of nursing home bruises are purposefully inflicted by reading our full article: Nursing Home Bruises Caused by Negligence.

The person liable for your car accident injuries may be closer than you think...

Most people assume that the driver of the other vehicle was responsible for their car accident and injuries. However, if you were a passenger in the car that crashed, it is important to consider that the driver of the vehicle you were riding in was at fault. In these cases, the driver may be held accountable for the collision as well as any related damages.

Should you pursue an injury claim against the driver of the vehicle you were a passenger in, even if it is someone you

When Your Marriage is Changed Forever Because of a Brain Injury

The affects of a serious brain injury can be obvious: paralysis, disability, memory issues, personality changes, chronic headaches. But the affects of traumatic brain injuries on a marriage can be subtler. For example, your physical and emotional relationship may suffer, you may lose your closest companion and confidant, and your spouse's household contributions may be limited or completely eliminated.

Could you deserve compensation because someone else's negligence negatively affected your marriage? Read more at our website.
